East Ogwell has a 14th century cruciform church (St. Bartholomew). In the 15th century the N. transept was enlarged into a full aisle; the S. transept was left untouched. It contains the canopied Elizabethan altar-tomb of Richard Reynell, Sheriff of Devon (d. 1585), and of his wife Agnes. The chancel screen is of an early square-headed type, probably early 15th century A Jacobean screen spans the tower arch. Note also the fine octagonal 14th century font, and some ancient glass in the vestry window.

Portlemouth faces Salcombe (to which there is a ferry) across the mouth of the Kingsbridge estuary. From the hillside just below the parish church is seen one of the most beautiful estuary views in England, looking N. to Kingsbridge and the distant Moor. The coastal scenery is also very beautiful; most of the cliffs belong to the National Trust. The church (St. Winwaloe) suffered a thorough restoration in 1881 when the floor-levels were radically altered. All the window tracery, roofs, and seating were modernised at the same time. The rood-screen (c. 1500), of the Dartmouth type, probably marks the completion of the new fabric. The lower panels have a fine series of figure paintings, the figure holding a church being St. Winwaloe.

Putford, East is a pleasant little place among trees, with good quiet views and some picturesque stone-built farmhouses, probably of Elizabethan date. The church (dedication unknown) was almost wholly rebuilt in 1882. It contains an elegant 12th century font, some late medieval tiles in the south porch, and a pulpit made out of a medieval rood-screen.

Among the farms of the parish, Mambury and Winslade are interesting. Mambury, approached by a long avenue of beeches, was a freehold estate from its beginning in the 12th or 13th century.

Winslade lies in remote country, below the topmost point of Melbury Hill (709 ft.). It gave its name to the Wynslade (sometimes Wydeslade) family, who were long seated here. John Wynslade and his son William took a prominent part in the Western Rebellion of 1549; the former was executed for his share in the rising and all his estates were forfeited to Edward VI. The present farmhouse contains a good deal of the early 16th century mansion.
